The great forage crop of the irrigated sections of the West is alfalfa, but it bloats cattle and sheep so badly that it is very dangerous to pasture it, hence the farmers of the irrigated sections (and they form the great majority of the substantial farmers in Colorado, Utah and surrounding states) do not keep anything like the amount of stock that they would if it were not for this bloating. If some discovery or substitution which would overcome this great disadvantage could be made, there would be a reaction upon many phases of agriculture, including the growing of beets.¹ This is only one example of the indirect and complex matters involved. ¹ See Amer. Sugar Ind. and Beet Sugar Gazette, Sept., 1911, p. 410, relative to Sandberg Beet Harvester Co., Odgen, Utah. ¹ Good stock as distinguished from the poor grade cattle which...
