Our work has been done with very high powers (Zeiss obj. r 4 and No. 12 Zeiss compensating oculare). The nephridia of the two Actinotrochx have much the same structure, but in Species A. we have been unable to find that the internal end of the nephridial canal branches, while in Species B. the internal end divides into two short branches. Figs. 52, 52a, 52b represent thi-ee transverse sections through the anterior part of the nephridium of Species B. Fig. 52 is through the nephridial canal just posterior to its internal end. Darkly staining dots seen in the lumen represent cross sections of long fiagella such as Goodrich (!) has described in the adenocytes of Amphioxm. Fig. 52a shows a section through the nephridial canal a few sections anterior to that of fig. 52, and at the same time it shows...
